Practice Under Article 9 of the Uniform Commercial Code 2008 the personal property security acts ppsas in effect in the canadian common law provinces have their intellectual roots in the 1972 version of article 9 secured trans actions of the uniform commercial code in the united states article 9 has recently undergone a complete revision this article offers a comparative overview of the new regime the authors begin by identifying those features of the new article 9 for which analogous provision already is made in all or most of the ppsas they then analyze certain other new features which they do not believe should be exported to a canadian context the most notable of these are the designation of the debtor s law as the universal choice of law rule for perfection but not priority of all security interests and the introduction of special perfection and priority rules for security interests in deposit accounts and sales of payment intangibles the authors then review a miscellany of other provisions of the new article 9 which they believe do merit consideration for adaptation into the ppsas including an explicit provision for cross collateralization in purchase money inventory financing in their conclusion the authors offer some more general observations on the overall style and policy implications of the new article 9 they conclude that the increased emphasis on more detailed and specialized rules may paradoxically lead to greater uncertainty because of the increased complexity more fundamentally it puts into question the basic premise of both article 9 and the ppsas that the functional identity of all secured transactions demands an essentially unitary regulatory framework

Revised Article 9 of the Uniform Commercial Code 2016 article 9 of the uniform commercial code which governs i the grant of a security interest in personal property to secure payment or performance of an obligation a true security interest and ii the sale of receivables incorporates the primary property law principle of nemo dat quod non habet one cannot transfer an interest in property that one does not have and its corollary a transferee can receive what the transferor has and no more for good policy reasons however article 9 also enacts the innovative exception to nemo dat the filing priority principle codified in the first to file or perfect rule that permits a secured party who first files a financing statement to obtain a superior security interest over a secured party who first obtains a security interest and would otherwise prevail under nemo dat for true security interests the plain language of article 9 effectuates the policies of nemo dat and the filing priority principle for the sale of receivables under article 9 however the plain language of article 9 precludes application of the filing priority principle to many buyers of receivables and this result has led some scholars and practitioners to advocate the application of the filing priority principle to these buyers by implication despite the plain language of the statute this article analyzes the interplay in article 9 among nemo dat the filing priority principle and the important policy of respecting the plain language of a statute and argues that when the plain language of the statute protects the interests of buyers of receivables under nemo dat the filing priority principle should not be implied as a matter of policy to defeat those interests but when the language of the statute is ambiguous the filing priority principle should be applied to further the policy reasons for this exception to nemo dat

Secured Transactions 2019-10-31 pretty much everyone except maybe the drafters struggles with article nine of the uniform commercial code the statute that covers the rules about security interests in personal property fixtures and a few other secured transactions students in particular and practitioners who deal with it infrequently find it unwieldy confusing and generally frustrating the underlying concepts in the statute are for the most part logical and practical but the wording and structure often are difficult to figure out for those who are unfamiliar with the concepts article nine plainly stated takes each section of the statute and changes it into commonly understood language the book provides additional explanation and examples that clarify what the statute is trying to say this is the best way to understand what article nine says and how to use it and someone should have done this long ago okay maybe that s a bit of hyperbole but seriously take a look at it and tell us we re wrong the authors of article nine plainly stated have been teaching the course for more than 40 years collectively and have experienced the angst of both students and practitioners as they grapple with its complexities students will grasp the ideas more clearly than they otherwise would which will be a relief to any honest instructor of a secured transactions course and it will be helpful beyond measure to practitioners who need to quickly understand the statute this book makes the secured transactions world simpler for all concerned again maybe a bit of hyperbole but take a look for yourself
